"But roads can be built by the plan I propose and the defenses of the country at the same time can be much strengthened. Under such a system, the coast defenses would become something more than a string of disconnected forts. The physical betterment to the men who did the work would also be valuable and would mean the making of better citizens and better heads of families. I believe the States would gladly co-operate with the general Government in providing the route, which would be made up in large part of existing roads, improved by the Federal Government to meet the requirements." to begin at 8 o'clock will be Mrs. Clara

KREISLER CHARMS SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

Orchestra and Violinist Heard in Program of Pleasing Numbers.

Fritz Kreisler's magnificent render ng of Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major was easily the feature of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the National Theater and Mr. Kreisler's furmounting of the tech-nical difficulties was a triumph of nical difficulties was a triumph of virtuosity.

Moreover the applause which greeted him seemed to be the expression of ringere affection as well as a tribute to his power and charm as a musician. The finale, with its interwoven Russian folk songs was given in a particularly brilliant manner.

The second movement of Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, which was the closing number of the program, was easily the most delightful part of the orchestral program and was distinguizhed by delicacy and grace of execution, The symphony of the afternoon, Brahms' No. 4, in E minor, was of a character to appeal to the intelicet rather than to the emotions.
